

The Chinese Threat to America's Health

The United States faces a silent but escalating crisis in its pharmaceutical supply chain. With the overwhelming majority of essential drug ingredients sourced from overseas, particularly from adversarial nations like China, American health security and national readiness are at risk. Poor oversight, quality failures, and geopolitical vulnerabilities compound to form a perfect storm. This Economic Battleplan™ explores three key threats.

In this briefing we will discuss the following:

- » America's Dangerous Dependence on Foreign Pharmaceutical Supply Chains
- » Poor Quality Control and Lack of Oversight in Foreign Drug Manufacturing
- » Urgent Need for Reform and Reshoring to Secure Drug Safety

YOUR MISSION: Understand the hidden threats within the U.S. pharmaceutical supply chain and learn actionable strategies to ensure drug safety and national resilience.

WHY YOU SHOULD CARE

- » A disruption in pharmaceutical imports could lead to widespread shortages, halting hospital operations and endangering civilian and military lives.
- » Substandard or contaminated drugs, already present in the U.S. market, may compromise the health of you or your loved ones.
- » By understanding and supporting reform, we can restore control over essential medicines and protect public health and economic security.

Ep. 9-340 (OSINT) Open-Sourced Intelligence Report. This briefing includes a conversation between Kevin Freeman and Rosemary Gibson. Rosemary is a long time friend of the Economic War Room® and an American Patriot.

Rosemary Gibson is a distinguished author, speaker, and senior advisor at The Hastings Center, renowned for her expertise in healthcare quality, patient safety, and the national security implications of America's dependence on foreign pharmaceutical manufacturing. She is the author of China Rx: Exposing the Risks of America's Dependence on China for Medicine, a pivotal work that sheds light on the vulnerabilities in the U.S. drug supply chain.

With a career spanning over two decades, Gibson served as a senior program officer at the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation, where she was the chief architect of a $250 million, 12-year national strategy to integrate palliative care into U.S. hospitals, significantly increasing the number of such programs nationwide. Her commitment to patient safety and healthcare reform is further exemplified by her roles on various boards and committees, including the Accreditation Council for Graduate Medical Education and the MedStar Institute for Quality and Patient Safety.

Gibson's contributions to medical literature and public health policy have earned her numerous accolades, including the highest honor from the American Medical Writers Association and the Lifetime Achievement Award from the American Academy of Hospice and Palliative Medicine. Her educational background includes a summa cum laude degree from Georgetown University and a master's degree from the London School of Economics.

1. America's Dangerous Dependence on Foreign Pharmaceutical Supply Chains

The United States depends on foreign countries, particularly China, for 90% of the key starting materials and ingredients used in generic drugs, which constitute 95% of medications dispensed in hospitals and pharmacies.

This reliance creates a precarious situation where a disruption in exports from China could cripple the U.S. healthcare system within months, leaving hospitals unable to function and pharmacies empty.

“If China shut the door on our exports, within months, our hospitals would cease to function and our pharmacies would be pretty empty.” –Rosemary Gibson

The COVID-19 pandemic exposed the fragility of globalized supply chains, as the U.S. faced severe shortages and rationing of critical medications.

Additionally, geopolitical tensions, such as trade wars or restrictive policies like China's anti-espionage law, exacerbate the risk by limiting access to reliable supplies.

This dependency is not just a logistical issue but a national security concern.

“Imagine if our soldiers were subject to an anthrax attack, and then the drugs that they were taking weren’t available because they’re made in China.” –Kevin Freeman

Critical medications for soldiers, government officials, and civilians could become unavailable during emergencies, such as bioterrorism or pandemics.

The infiltration of harmful substances, like fentanyl, into the U.S. market further illustrates how foreign control over chemical production can be weaponized, costing tens of thousands of American lives annually.

Addressing this vulnerability is essential to safeguard public health and national stability.

Attention: China controls the lifeblood of our drug supply chain, threatening our health and national security.

2. Poor Quality Control and Lack of Oversight in Foreign Drug Manufacturing

As if that threat was not enough, the quality of generic drugs, many of which are produced overseas, is alarmingly inconsistent.

Contaminated drugs, such as heparin traced back to a Chinese plant, have caused catastrophic health outcomes, including organ failure and death, as seen in the case of a healthy physician who died after receiving tainted medication.

China’s disregard for FDA regulations, coupled with barriers like the anti-espionage law, prevents effective inspections, leaving the U.S. unable to ensure the safety of imported drugs.

A Department of Defense study has revealed a 13.4% manufacturing defect rate in tested generics.

“The Department of Defense started a generic drug testing program. They realized that the FDA doesn’t test. It just doesn’t do that. And early findings from the first batch of six different drugs. The manufacturing defect rate was 13.4%. If you have that defect rate in making cars or airplanes... even electric lamps that could turn into a fire in your house, that’s totally unacceptable. So we’ve got to start testing, expand the testing, put the data out there, and only buy quality [products] from trustworthy countries that respect our laws and regulations.” –Rosemary Gibson

Impurities, including carcinogens and lead, have also been found in generics, posing long-term health risks, while poorly manufactured drugs may fail to dissolve correctly, rendering them ineffective.

This lack of oversight directly affects patients who rely on generics for affordability, as substandard drugs can exacerbate illnesses or cause new health issues.

The absence of routine testing by the FDA compounds the problem, leaving consumers unaware of the risks in their medications.

The fact that even critical drugs, like those used in transplant or heart failure treatments, may be defective underscores the urgency of addressing quality control failures.

Attention: Poor quality control and lack of regulatory oversight in foreign drug manufacturing result in defective generics that endanger patient health and undermine trust in the healthcare system.

3. Urgent Need for Reform and Reshoring to Secure Drug Safety

To address these vulnerabilities, experts advocate for expanding independent testing programs, such as those initiated by the Department of Defense and Kaiser Health Plan, to identify high-quality generics and inform purchasing decisions.

Holding U.S. companies accountable for sourcing from unreliable foreign suppliers is critical, as is reshoring pharmaceutical production to trustworthy countries or domestic facilities.

Market discipline, driven by transparent testing data, can pressure companies to prioritize quality over cost.

Additionally, involving major health systems, the VA, and the Department of Health and Human Services in using this data can enhance drug safety across the board.

Practical steps for consumers include monitoring their medications for changes in manufacturer or efficacy and storing drugs properly to maintain potency.

“We have to expand this independent testing program and have big buyers, big health plans use it to inform their purchasing decisions.” –Rosemary Gibson

Reshoring production and implementing rigorous testing not only improve drug safety but also strengthen economic and national security by reducing reliance on adversarial nations.

Consumers can play a role by advocating for transparency and supporting policies that incentivize domestic manufacturing.

This multifaceted approach requires collaboration between government, industry, and individuals to ensure a resilient, high-quality drug supply chain.

Attention: Reforming the pharmaceutical supply chain through testing, accountability, and reshoring is essential to ensure safe, effective medications and protect public health.
