

Killed to Order: The CCP's War Against Humanity

The Chinese Communist Party's forced organ harvesting industry is not merely a human rights scandal. It is a window into the moral structure of a totalitarian regime that treats human beings as commodities, religious believers as enemies of the state, and Western medical systems as tools to be exploited. Forced organ harvesting refers to the killing of people for their organs, often after they have been detained, medically tested, cataloged, and matched to a paying recipient.

This “kill to order” model reverses ethical transplant medicine. In a legitimate system, a donor becomes available first, and doctors then work to match that donor with a recipient. In China's alleged system, the recipient comes first, and the state searches a database of living, vulnerable people until a match is found. That is why this issue must be understood not only as a medical ethics crisis, but as a strategic and national-security concern: the CCP has shown a willingness to weaponize trade, technology, fentanyl, propaganda, economic dependency, and now life itself in pursuit of profit, elite survival, and global dominance.

In this briefing we will discuss the following:

- » Forced Organ Harvesting: Persecution, Profit, and Elite Survival
- » Warning Signs of Totalitarian Abuse
- » Western Complicity and the Necessary Legislative Action

YOUR MISSION: Understand how the CCP's forced organ harvesting industry exposes the true nature of America's greatest adversary, recognize the warning signs of totalitarian abuse, and support concrete actions that cut off Western participation in atrocity-linked medical markets.

WHY YOU SHOULD CARE

- » This issue reveals how the CCP can turn human life into an economic asset, using prisoners of conscience as an on-demand supply chain for organs.
- » The same machinery of dehumanization used against Falun Gong, Uyghurs, Christians, and other targeted groups is a warning about how totalitarian regimes prepare populations to tolerate evil.
- » Understanding the difference between ethical organ donation and “kill-to-order” transplantation helps expose why unusually short transplant wait times in China are so alarming.
- » Western medical, financial, and academic institutions may be entangled in systems that violate the most basic standards of human dignity and medical ethics.
- » The erosion of medical ethics abroad can affect the West directly by weakening the Hippocratic principle that every patient must be treated as a person, not as a resource.
- » Legislative action, state-level restrictions, sanctions, reporting requirements, and grassroots pressure can help end American complicity and force accountability.
- » This is not only about China. It is about whether free societies will defend the sacred value of human life against regimes that view people as expendable assets.

Ep. 10-398 (OSINT) Open-Sourced Intelligence Report. This briefing includes a conversation between Kevin D. Freeman, CFA, D.Sc. (h.c.) and Jan Jekielek. Jan Jekielek is a friend of the Economic War Room® and an American Patriot.

Jan Jekielek is the senior editor of The Epoch Times, host of American Thought Leaders, and author of Killed to Order: China's Organ Harvesting Industry and the True Nature of America's Biggest Adversary. His work focuses heavily on the Chinese Communist Party, human rights, religious persecution, forced organ harvesting, information warfare, and the broader national-security implications of America's relationship with China.

Through years of interviews with doctors, investigators, survivors, policymakers, and China experts, Jekielek has become one of the leading media voices explaining how forced organ harvesting reveals the true nature of the CCP. His work frames the issue not only as a medical ethics crisis, but as a strategic warning about a regime willing to weaponize human life, suppress faith communities, and exploit Western institutions.

1. Forced Organ Harvesting: Persecution, Profit, and Elite Survival

In a legitimate organ donation system, the donor comes first. A person suffers a catastrophic accident or is declared beyond recovery under strict medical standards. An ethics team must confirm that the donor cannot survive, and only then can doctors begin the complex process of matching blood type, tissue type, organ size, timing, and medical condition to a waiting recipient.

China's forced organ harvesting system turns that process upside down. In this model, the recipient comes first. A wealthy transplant tourist, connected party official, or member of the ruling elite needs an organ, and the system searches through a database of living prisoners of conscience who have already been medically profiled. The matching person is then selected, killed, and harvested.

“We’re talking about the large-scale killing of prisoners of conscience for their organs.” –Jan Jekielek

This is what makes the phrase “kill to order” so important. This is not ordinary black-market organ trafficking. It is not a corrupt doctor operating outside the system. It is an organized supply chain in which detained human beings are treated as medical inventory. Blood typing, tissue typing, DNA testing, and organ scanning become the infrastructure of industrialized killing.

The economics are horrifying. In a normal ethical transplant system, patients can wait months or years because organs only become available under rare and carefully governed circumstances. In China, the promise of extremely short wait times suggests something very different: the ability to locate a matching “donor” on demand. According to Jan Jekielek, a transplant tourist may pay $100,000 to $200,000 for an organ that can be produced in weeks.

“There’s a database made of blood type and tissue type of innocent prisoners of conscience, and then that person is matched from the vast field of prospective donors to the single recipient.” –Jan Jekielek

The roots of this system appear to run through the persecution of Falun Gong practitioners. Falun Gong is a grassroots qigong practice built around slow-motion exercises and the principles of truthfulness, compassion, and forbearance.

It has no formal hierarchy, no tithing system, no membership roster, and no political army albeit with strongly religious overtones. But by 1999, its number of practitioners had reportedly grown larger than the membership of the Communist Party itself.

The CCP responded by labeling Falun Gong a targeted “black class,” meaning a group marked by the regime for dehumanization, struggle, reeducation, and punishment.

Once a population is branded as dangerous or subversive, it becomes easier for the state to imprison them, abuse them, and make the broader society indifferent to their suffering. In the case of Falun Gong, that persecution allegedly became the foundation for mass incarceration, medical testing, and forced organ harvesting.

“This is more than a human rights issue. It’s a window into the CCP’s willingness to weaponize everything, including life itself, in its quest for global dominance.”
–Kevin D. Freeman, CFA, D.Sc. (h.c.)

This system is not only about profit. It is also about power and elite survival. Jan Jekielek points to Project 981, described as a CCP elite longevity program, as a chilling example of how forced organ harvesting may serve the personal interests of top leaders.

If the ruling class has access to repeated, on-demand transplants, then the harvesting of prisoners becomes more than a commercial atrocity. It becomes a mechanism of regime preservation.

⚠ Attention: The CCP has turned persecuted believers into an on-demand organ supply chain for profit, political privilege, and elite survival.

2. Warning Signs of Totalitarian Abuse

Atrocity does not begin in the operating room. It begins in language.

Totalitarian regimes prepare the ground for abuse by first teaching society to see a targeted group as dangerous, disloyal, subhuman, or disposable. In Communist China, Jan Jekielek describes this as the creation of the “black classes”—groups marked by the regime for struggle, punishment, reeducation, and persecution.

Landowners were once treated this way. Falun Gong practitioners were later treated this way. Uyghurs, Tibetans, Christians, and other religious communities have also faced severe persecution.

The purpose of this propaganda is not merely to insult a group. It is to lower the moral resistance of the broader population. If a targeted group can be framed as evil, extremist, or threatening, then ordinary people are more likely to look away when that group is surveilled, detained, abused, or made to disappear.

“This dehumanizing rhetoric is always the kind of prequel to the atrocity.” –Jan Jekielek

That pattern matters because totalitarian regimes rarely announce their crimes honestly. They create a moral justification first. The victims are accused of standing in the way of the party, the nation, or the common good. Once the population has been conditioned to see them as a threat, the next steps become easier: isolation, surveillance, incarceration, forced confession, medical testing, and silence.

Falun Gong practitioners became a primary target of this process after 1999. Their refusal to submit to ideological reeducation made them especially vulnerable.

According to Jekielek, there was an unwritten rule in the jails that Falun Gong deaths would be considered suicides. That kind of rule reveals the danger of a system where the state controls the narrative, the prisons, the medical records, and the bodies.

“There’s this unwritten rule in the jails that all Falun Gong deaths will be considered suicides.” –Jan Jekielek

The warning signs now extend beyond Falun Gong. Uyghurs in Xinjiang—also known by many as East Turkestan—have faced mass detention, pervasive surveillance, and what the U.S. government has officially recognized as genocide.

Jekielek describes Uyghurs being blood typed and DNA typed in their homes, creating the kind of biometric information that could be used for organ matching.

The same concern applies to Christians. Jekielek warns that dehumanizing rhetoric against Christians is increasing, alongside pressure against underground churches, the targeting of Zion Church, the imprisonment of Jimmy Lai, controls on Catholic clergy, and Catholic bishops held incommunicado.

Direct evidence of forced organ harvesting from Christians may not yet be established in the same way, but the warning pattern is familiar: first comes dehumanization, then surveillance, then detention, then the possibility of atrocity.

⚠ Attention: When a regime dehumanizes religious and ethnic communities, imprisons them, and medically profiles them, the world must treat it as an early warning sign of atrocity.

3. Western Complicity and the Necessary Legislative Action

The West has not been a passive observer. In many ways, it has been entangled.

For decades, Western policy assumed that engagement with China would liberalize the regime. The theory was simple: trade, technology, investment, academic partnerships, and medical cooperation would make China more open.

Instead, the CCP took the capital, technology, expertise, and legitimacy while remaining totalitarian. What was supposed to transform China has, in many cases, helped strengthen the very system the West hoped to moderate.

That same failure is visible in the medical space. Sophisticated transplant systems do not operate in isolation. They require trained surgeons, medical technology, anti-rejection drugs, research partnerships, hospital relationships, logistics, and international legitimacy. According to Jan Jekielek, Western institutions have helped provide parts of that infrastructure.

“We have become complicit in this crime. We train some of the transplant surgeons. We provide all sorts of technologies that facilitate it.” –Jan Jekielek

This complicity is not only institutional. It is ethical.

Jekielek warns that the forced organ harvesting issue is connected to a broader erosion of medical ethics. The traditional Hippocratic view treats each patient as a person whose life must be protected.

By contrast, utilitarian bioethics prioritizes the “greatest good” for the greatest number, even if some individuals are sacrificed. In a communist system, that logic becomes especially dangerous because the “greatest good” is defined as the survival and supremacy of the Communist Party.

Once that framework takes hold, the individual becomes expendable. The prisoner of conscience becomes a resource. The dissident becomes a medical asset. The religious believer becomes a cost the regime is willing to eliminate.

“Connecting with the regime where kill to order is the way that transplantation is done... is taking us in a very, very dark direction.” –Jan Jekielek

That dark direction is not limited to China. Jekielek points to Western debates over the “dead donor rule,” the ethical standard that organs should only be taken from someone who is truly dead and beyond recovery. He also raises concerns about medically assisted death in Canada, where euthanasia has become a billable medical treatment and where organ procurement can be linked to the process of planned death.

The issue is not that the West has become China. The issue is that the West is beginning to absorb dangerous assumptions: that some lives may be worth less, that medical killing can be reclassified as treatment, and that human beings can be evaluated according to their usefulness to others.

⚠ Attention: America must stop enabling atrocity-linked transplant systems through medical cooperation, financial relationships, taxpayer funding, and silence.
